DOUGLAS WHITE

Douglas White (b. 1977, UK) transforms discarded and overlooked materials into uncanny, often monumental sculptures. Working intuitively with objects such as blown-out tyres, damaged metal, and industrial detritus, White reveals the hidden energy, histories, and traces embedded in everyday matter. His practice spans sculpture, drawing, and electroformed objects, exploring the boundary between organic and industrial forms, and the transformative effects of friction, movement, and electricity.

White graduated from the Ruskin School of Art (2000) and the Royal College of Art (2005). He has exhibited widely across the UK, Europe, the US, and South America, and his work is held in major collections including the Donum Estate, David Roberts Art Foundation, Saatchi Collection, Frank Cohen, and Cass Sculpture Foundation.

In his recent exhibition, The Great Wave, White presents two monumental sculptures, The Great Wave (after Hokusai) and a towering Black Palm, alongside Lichtenberg Drawings and electroformed works. The wave, built from tyre fragments, captures motion, collapse, and industrial energy, while the palm rises vertically, suggesting endurance and transformation. Smaller works employ electricity to trace branching geometries and mineralised surfaces, revealing hidden structures and energetic forces. Across scale and medium, White's work foregrounds process over static image. Materials carry evidence of friction, voltage, and time, presenting matter as active, transformed, and entangled with human and natural systems, offering a meditation on movement, breakdown, and persistence.
